Join us for a special presentation as Lieutenant General Schmidle shares his perspective on policy and legal implications of emerging cyber capabilities. This multi-disciplinary topic will engage and interest the entire Pitt community, and is particularly relevant to students and faculty in the law, information, policy, and technology sectors. Don’t miss this rare opportunity to interact with one of the highest ranking members of the U.S. Marine Corps.

Schmidle, who was appointed as the Principal Deputy Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation, Office of the Secretary of Defense in March of 2014, is responsible for analyzing and evaluating plans, programs, and budgets in relation to U.S. defense objectives and resource constraints. Additionally, Schmidle has served in a number of key staff assignments including as Deputy Commander for U.S. Cyber Command. He holds a doctorate from Georgetown University and has been published in the fields of moral philosophy, social psychology, and military history.
